

Digitization

Simon Shezi

Digital Resource Management from Data to Knowledge 21-23 July 2009, Durban, South Africa

Introduction

- ▶ What is digitization?
- ▶ Also referred to as image capture,
- ▶ Process of creating a digital representation or image of an original through scanning or digital photography.
- ▶ In summary, digitization converts materials that can be read by people to a format that can be read only by machines (digital). Flatbed scanning, digital cameras, planetary cameras, and a number of other devices can be used

Why digitize

- ▶ The main reason to digitize are to enhance access and improve preservation.
- ▶ By digitizing collections, institutions can make information accessible that was previously available to a select group of researchers.
- ▶ Digitization can also help preserve precious materials.
- ▶ Making high-quality digital images available electronically can reduce wear and tear on fragile items.
- ▶ This does not mean, however, that digital copies should be seen as a replacement for the original piece

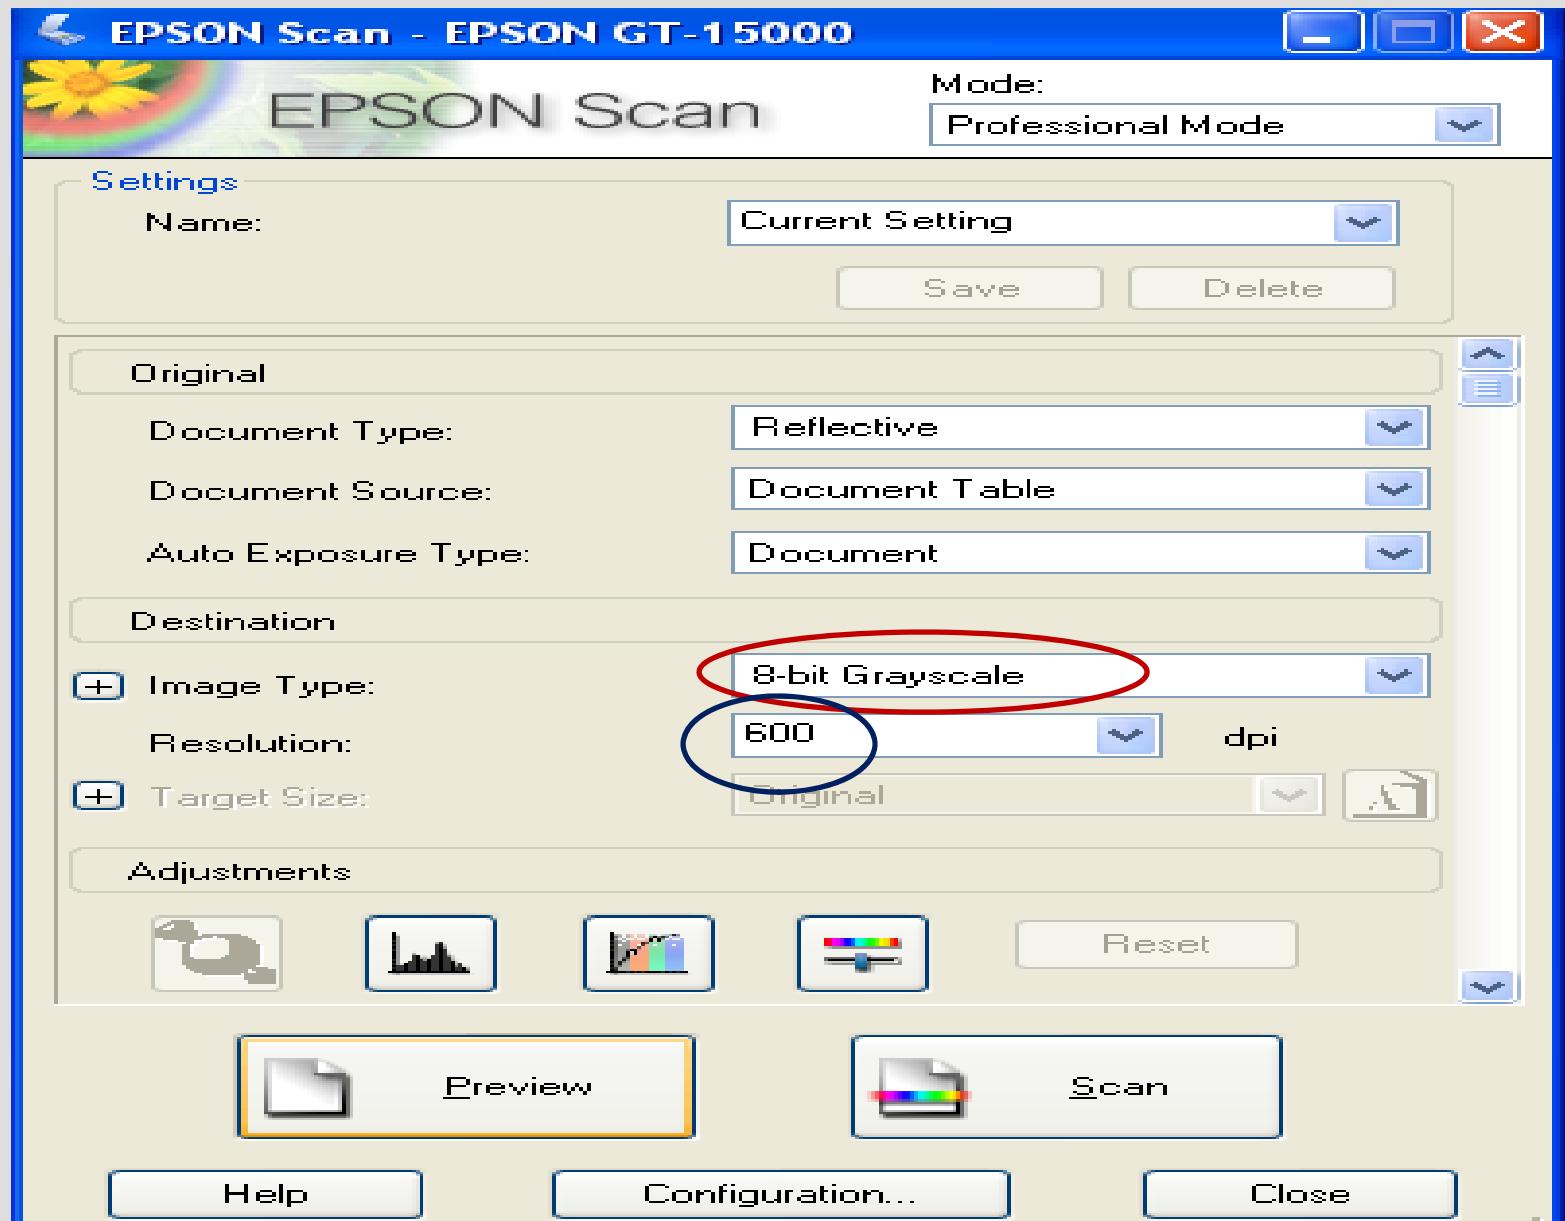

Selecting a scanner

1. Select your scanner in proportion to its intended use
2. Understand the product specifications
3. Consider the nature of the material to be scanned

Soweto Speaking to Miriam Tlali	2	A staffrider vs. let's just it, a when of sorts, like Hermes or Mercury — the messenger of the gods in classical mythology — he is almost certainly as light-fingered as he is fleet-footed. A skillful carrier, a bringer of messages, a useful person but... slightly dispensable. Our censors may not like him, but they should consider putting up with him. A whole new literature is knocking at the door, and if our society is to change without falling apart it needs all the messages it can get — the bad as well as the good.

editorial notes

Health and safety issues have long been part of labour's agenda, and with good reason: hundreds of workers die every year in accidents, while many others suffer the lingering effects of debilitating disease.

Apartheid planning led to the siting of working class residential areas next to industry. These communities are the first to experience industry's environmental effects.

Our cover story explores ways in which trade unions can deepen their involvement in health, safety and environmental issues.

The taxi industry is perhaps the best example of black entrepreneurship in South Africa. It has, however, been plagued by violence. Taxi drivers labour under appalling conditions. In this issue, we report on initiatives to transform this sector.

Also in this issue: John Copely responds to our "open letter" in the last issue, and Sam Shilson defends the tripartite alliance.

At the end of last year we reported on the healthy state of the Labour Bulletin. During a period which saw the demise of many independent publications, the Bulletin has made great strides towards self-sufficiency. We are, however, still in need of some external support in order to keep our subscription rates within reach of our substantial worker readership.

The Bulletin is proud to announce that it has received a generous grant from the 'Strengthening Civil Society' Fund administered by the Department of Labour.

This is an historic moment for both the Bulletin and the democratic movement in South Africa. Along with others in the movement, the Bulletin has suffered extensive state repression. Editors were banned, editors detained and deported and a member of our board assassinated. We survived to become South Africa's leading labour journal, at least in part through the dedication of members of our board, who continue to offer their services.

The grant is recognition of the fact that a strong and vibrant civil society is essential to any democratic project. It is also recognition of the Bulletin's contribution to building the trade union movement, an important component of civil society. In the years to come, the Bulletin will continue to offer the independent and critical perspective that has become its hallmark.

Health and safety issues have been part of labour's agenda, and with good reason: hundreds of workers die every year in accidents, while many more suffer the lingering effects of debilitating diseases.

Apart from planning how to defend workers' health and safety, these communities are the first to experience industry's environmental effects.

Our members are the unions in which trade unions can strengthen their involvement in health, safety and environmental issues.

The text below is perhaps the best example of the kind of writing that appears in South Africa. It has, however, been plagued by viruses. Text drives labour under appalling circumstances, and it is important that initiatives to transform this sector.

Also in this issue: John Copely responds to our letter to him from John Lewis and Sam Shemesh about the Hevitele actions.

At the end of last year we reported on the healthy state of the Labour Bulletin. Despite its poor financial state, and despite the fact that independent publications, the Bulletin has made great strides towards self-financement. We are continuing to make arrangements external to ourselves in order to keep our subscription rates within reach of our industrial worker readership.

The Bulletin is pleased to announce that it has received a generous grant from the South African Civil Society Fund, established by the Department of Labour. This grant will enable the Bulletin to be diffused and the democratic movement in South Africa. Along with others in the movement, the Bulletin has suffered extensive damage from viruses. Existing computer hardware obtained and donated until a number of our local equipment. We survived to tell the tale. Many thanks to the individual, not least through the dedication of members of our board, who continue to offer their services.

This grant is recognition of the fact that a strong and vibrant civil society is essential to any democratic project. It is also recognition of the role of the Bulletin as a key element of the union movement, an important component of civil society. In the years to come, the Bulletin will continue to offer the independent and critical perspective that has become its trademark.
